SKIN CANCER. Beveral years ago 1 was called to see a colosed coman who had a malignant form of cancer on woman who had a malignant form of cancer on her foot. The cancer grow worse under the prescribed treatment, and the toes and one side of the foot were at length eaten entirely away. The patient could not have survived much longer, but I commenced the use of Swift's Specific, and it cured her sound well. That was three years ago, and there has been on return of the disease. I regard Swift's Specific a most excellent medicine for blood diseases, as fix tendency is to drive out the polson.

For three or four years I had an eating sore on my tongue that made a considerable hole in it. I became alarmed at its progress, and went to Atlanta for treatment. The result was that I commenced the use of Swift's Specific, and the sore was soon gone, without a trace of it left. Thomaston, Ga., Mar. 14, '89. A. LEWIS.

Did she hear aright? Was it of her, Eleanor Woodford, they were talking? Swiftly she sped out of the dark, heavily-curtained back parlor of the stylish boarding house and into her room, a gorgeous alcove apartment on the first floor. She could not mount the stairs on account of her weak spine. Weak spine? She forgot all about it as she paced the floor, angry tears gushing from her large, brown eyes. It was shameful—it was wicked—to be so abused. She had never in her whole petted life been found fault with. As to money, what did she know about it? Her bitter sobs ceased, and her wounded vanity gradually lost itself in better thoughts.

She becan to feel glad that she had

The end of the year rolled around. Eleanor watched her husband's face with ever-increasing anxiety. One evening he ast buried in thought, from which all her endeavors could not rouse him. He did not feel well he said. All night he tossed and muttered. Calculations and figures were uppermost.

He was up early and away. Eleanor hastened her preparations and carefully counted her little hoard, the earnings of months. Late in the afternoon she came home with the proceeds of her last batch of typewriting, glowing with exercise and the happiness of contributing at least several hundred doilars to meet her flusband's creditors. He was there, lying on the sofe, pale and hopeless. Forgetting all else, she flung herself beside him with a sob.

"Oh, Harry, my dearest, what is if? Tell me what it is that is killing you? I have a right to know."

"How? What is the trouble?"

"Well, dear, what now? Another new gown?" he asked, with his old sweet smile.

She pressed her lips in a slow, reverential fashion upon the broad, white brow, another pang at her heart. Then she spoke:

"Not this time, Harry dear; let's go to Mrs. Wickham's!" he echoed, "why, you wouldn't stay in her dull little place a week." But even-sis, he spoke there

"Don't you like it here?" were his next words, as he glanced around the luxurious suite.
"Yes," she said, "except that there are too many people here. It is so noisy."
"Yery well, then we will try it—anything to please my darling;" and he wrapped his arms around her as he would full a restless child.

"I look as if I love my big boy very much, don't I?" she answered, merrily. His answer was another kiss, and as he turned toward his dressing closet her heart sched with unspoken tenderness, not considered strong enough to sit at table. For this service an extra charge was made.

Later, when he opened the evening paper, she sat and watched him. Surely those little lines of care were new, now that he was not fondly smilling upon her. O, toolish, selfish wife! Rising gently, her long handsome tea gown trailing behind her, one slender white hand upon his shoulder. Then playfully putting by the paper, she sat down upon his knee.

It cure dysentery and diarrhos, regulates the stomach and bowle tures wind colle actions the The move was made, and Eleanor found that she was not so much fatigued as he had often felt after a day's lounging with a novel. Her husband thought it only a new whim, but as it was not an expensive one he could not complain. When he wasted to take her driving, she playfully told him she was learning to walk—horses were not safe.

The first step, she thought. Now for the next. It came to her almost by unsgle. In a little rear hall room sat Margaret Dewees, clicking away at her typewriter. A strong, clear-headed girl, who had maintained herself these ten years, and had put by her savings.

She was soon to be married to a stal-

It was hard to hide this activity and cheerfulness from him, but she did. She kept in the old rat as nearly as possible when he was at home. He saw that she was stronger and it lightened his labors.

"My little woman does not ride or read any more." he said one evening in the indulgent tone he used toward her.

"Why, yes, I do read. Don't you see my little library there?"

"Yes, but it seems to me I miss some-

"It is ruin, Eleanor. I have brought you to poverty—you whom I would have died to make happy."
"You are talking in riddles, Harry," she exclaimed, rallying from her alarm. "Am I not the happiest woman in the world? And don't you see how well and strong I am?"
She coaxed the whole story from his lips. Then, with affected lightness, she said: "Is that all! Why, you frightened me terribly; I thought you were ill—had caught some horrible disease or other. See here." As she spoke she ran to her desk, took out her treasure and poured it into his hands in her impulsive fashion.
"Eleanor! What is this?"
"This? Why, this is only your wife's selfishness and laxiness in another form."
Then her story had to be told. Their combined efforts still fell short of the required sum, but she triumpliantly produced the deed to the western land. For a season there were careases and even tears of mutual love and thankful. For a season there were caresses and even tears of mutual love and thankful-
